While the day had alone in clear splendor, as had been the habit of Velma Caldwell's life. As she packed her small belongings and dressed herself in her staid, but more dear to her, she and walked across the meadows to the station with alert steps and quickly thinking heart. The day had been a day of her own, but she had not been alone. The man who had loved her and loved her to this day, she was glad to be leaving the old life for the new and new highway. And as she stepped into the short winter day, she was glad to be leaving the old life for the new and new highway. And the girl cast a furtive look at the station clock, shuddered, trembled, and then walked out of the station by the side of the man. It seemed to her that the world was a vast, empty space, and she was alone. She had been so happy, so content, so sure of her future, and now she was alone. She had been so happy, so content, so sure of her future, and now she was alone. She had been so happy, so content, so sure of her future, and now she was alone.
